

1. Invisibility: Defining the Source

Lauren wrote me about work. She has not been able to get a good job for a long time. She is well qualified, but simply gets no traction in the marketplace beyond survival jobs.

That was a fairly unwelcome problem to solve because the root could be so many places, but she agreed to do several rounds of emails as I floated possible rocks for her to look under. She was mercifully concise in her answers, so we got through the process reasonably unscathed.

I eliminated the seven curses, generational curses, birth order curses, curses on time, trauma bond to land and a few other things. In the end, it turned out to be a mantle of invisibility. In her childhood there were some contexts where she was not physically or emotionally safe. Her survival mechanism was to become as still and invisible as possible.

When that happens early on, it causes a disruption in spirit, soul and brain, which means that all three have to be addressed in order to restore her right place in the business culture. She can't just break a curse or remove a mantle.

I said it would probably take a year of work on her part, I would coach her, but she needed to let you look over her shoulder so we get maximum mileage out of the time I spend flogging the keyboard.

She bought in. So you will be seeing irregularly sporadic blogs on this topic as she trudges through the restructuring process.

I decided to start with her soul. The Office of Personhood will serve as a good tool for expanding the dynamics of her soul. I choose this because it should give some quick results. She assures me she has the discretionary time to invest in the project, so working through the exercises in the offices of personhood and daughter should come quickly and produce measurable, verifiable results.

Then we will work on rewiring the brain. And finally dig into the spirit. Along the way, each of these will be developed in the context of her being seen naturally and generically in the community.

Each person's journey is unique, but I think there are a whole lot of Laurens out there who could tag along and transform your own lives.

Copyright November 2015 by Arthur Burk

